Routing in Angular 2 revisited

A long time ago we've written about routing in Angular 2 and you've probably noticed that this article is deprecated due to many changes and rewrites that happened in the router module of Angular 2. Just recently, the Angular team announced yet another version of the new router, in which they considered all the gathered feedback from the community to make it finally sophisticated enough, so it will fill our needs when we build applications with Angular 2.

- Let's add a tag to our component's template so that loaded components are displayed.
- Bootstrapping that app now displays a list of contacts
- Think of a contact id in our case, so we can fetch the contact object we want to display the details for.
- We still need to teach ContactsDetailComponent how to access the route parameters so it can use them to load a contact object.
- Let's say we want to build a contacts application (this is what we do in our Angular 2 Master Class).
